DEVOTED TO THE INTERESTS OF WASHINGTON COUNTY

VOLUME II. SPRINGFIELD, KY., WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 3, 1906. NUMBER 4

SUPREME COURT

Affirms Decission of Kentucky Court In James Howard Case.

Washington, Jan. 2.—The Supreme Court of the United States to-day virtually affirmed the decision of the Kentucky Court of Appeals in the case of James B Howard vs. the State of Kentucky.

Howard was tried three times in the Circuit Court of Franklin county on the charge of murdering Gov. William Gobel on January 30, 1900, and convicted each time.

He is now under sentence to life imprisonment and brought the case to this court to secure a review of the ruling of nhe Kentucky Court of Appeals affirming a decision of the Circuit Court against allowing another trial.

Mercer County

Herald: Senator J. P. Chinn has promised Mr. J. T. Cooke to introduce a bill in the Senate to make it a felony to sell a toy pistol.

D. N. Cogar closed a contract yesterday with a Chicago firm to erect for him at the depot an elevator of 40,000 bushels capacity.

A telegram was received here yesterday that Mr. George Robards was seriously ill in the hospital at Baltimore. His father, Mr. J. Wesley Robards, will leave for that place tomorrow to be with him.

J. W. DeWitt has sold his 182 acre farm, known as the Other Wheat place, near Salvisa to Lytle Vaught for $11,000. Mr. Vaught's residence in this city was taken in the trade at $5,000. The sale was made by the William T. Ewing Real Estate Agency.

As a compliment to Rev. W. T. Brooks, who closed the revival at the Christian church last Thursday with 141 additions, the members of the church gave them a delightful reception Friday evening. All the old congregation were present and all the new converts, and those friends outside the church who had been benefitted and interested in the meeting who felt they wished to bid the Brooks Brothers godspeed. Light refreshments were served and the evening passed most pleasantly.

Death of Miss Janes.

On Sunday, Dec. 31, 1905, about 5 a. m. at the home of her parents, Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Janes, near Valley Hill, Ky. the soul of their youngest daughter, Miss Daisy Janes went forth quietly and peacefully to meet its God.

This young girl—just budding into womanhood—had been for several months a sufferer from a stomach trouble which proved too much for skilful physicians and loving care and solicitude on the part of her family.

From her father's household there has departed a sunbeam, so to speak; for she was ever cheerful, loving and kind.

During her long and trying illness she was a marvel of patience to her physicians and a constant source of edification to every one around her by her Christian resignation to the Divine Will.

And, now, that she has passed into a better world where a devoted brother and a loving sister were found anxious to welcome her, it is no occasion for us to mourn but rather rejoice in her joy and theirs.

The esteem in which the young lady was held throughout the community was attested by the large concourse of friends who followed her remains to St. Rose's church on Monday morning at 9 a. m. where after appropriate obsequies her body was laid to rest.

A Friend.

Death of Mr. Carrico.

Lebanon Enterprise: Mr. Anderson Carrico, a highly respected farmer of Washington county, died at his home on the St. Rose pike, about three miles from Springfield, Wednesday December 20, 1905. Deceased had been in bad health for a number of years, a sufferer from consumption, but kept on his feet nearly all the time. On the day of his death, he arose as usual and attended to many little affairs about the farm. In the afternoon, he came home very much exhausted, and taking a seat went off into his death sleep without a struggle. Mr. Carrico was 50 years old and a citizen of sterling worth.

Funeral services were conducted at St. Rose church, in the presence of a large congregation last Friday after which his remains were laid to rest in the St. Rose cemetery.

Deceased was never married. He is survived by one brother Joseph F. Carrico and three sisters Bettie, Francis and Susie, who have the sympathy of a long list of friends in their bereavement.

Tapp-Miller

The marriage of Mr. Dillard S. Tapp, formerly of this place, and Miss Margaret Ada Miller, of Louisville which was announced in the last issue of the Sun, was solemnized at the home of the bride in Louisville last Thursday evening at 7:30 o'clock. Mr. and Mrs. Tapp left immediately after the ceremony for St. Louis from which place they will go to Carbondale, Ill. where they will make their home.

New Officers Sworn In

Washington county and Springfield regime changed Monday when the county and city officers were inducted into office. All were sworn in by Clerk Booker. The Mayor of Springfield is Hon. John W. Lewis and the Councilmen are Messrs. W. O. McChord, J. C. McElory, W. K. Robertson, O. A. Thompson, Conrad Hertlein and Charlie Logsden.

Mr. Skeans, who was elected constable of the Pottsville and eighth districts did not show up to be sworn in.

In Memory of Little Henryetta Lawrence.

The angle of death visited the home of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Lawrence, of Mackville, Tuesday evening of last week, and claimed their beautiful little daughter, Henryetta, who had been ill but two days with croup. A sweeter, more attractive little one never lived on earth. She had just reached that age—two years—when all of the pretty ways of infants find a place in the loving hearts of the parents, and her death, therefore is severely felt. The most skilled physicians did all in their power to relieve the little one, but to no avail.

We feel that there is not a sweeter angel in heaven than she.

Sympathy is extended to the bereaved parents.

A FRIEND.

Paynter Nominated.

Judge Thos. H. Paynter was nominated for United States Senator by the Democratic joint legislative caucus in Frankfort Tuesday night on the first ballot. The vote stood: Paynter, 59; Blackburn 34; Haldeman 10; David H. Smith 2. Harvey McCutchen and Eli H. Brown were nominated for Prison Commissioners.

LAWRENCE NOMINATED.

The Administration Candidate Wins With Votes to Spare.

Frankfort, Ky., Jan. 1.—The Democrats of the House met in caucus tonight and made the following nominations:

Henry Lawrence, of Trigg, Speaker; James B. Stone, of Jefferson, Clerk; M. F. Pogue, of Crittenden, Assistant Clerk; Miss Amy V. Lyons, of Jessamine, Enrolling Clerk; C. W. Longmire, of Fayette, Sergeant-at-Arms; C. C. Parrish, of Bullitt, Doorkeeper; C. M. Parrish, of Clark, Janitor; Guy Vinson, of Muhlenburg, and Rebel Martin, of Knott, Cloak-room keepers; Dudley Ragsdale, of Springfield, Herbert Drader, of Louisville, Ed. Sherman, of Breckenridge and John C. Miller, of Union, pages.

By a decisive vote of forty-one to thirty-three, three votes to spare, the Paynter forces in the Lower House of the Kentucky Legislature to-night decided their rights to rule the deliberations of that body. It was by that vote that W. J. Gooch, the Paynter candidate for caucus chairman, defeated Judge E. Berry, the opposite candidate.

In the speakership race, which followed immediately after, the precise vote will never be recorded, with Henry R. Lawrence, the Paynter candidate for Speaker, having 39 votes to his credit, and R. W. Miller, the opposition candidate, having 35 votes, Mr. Miller moved to make the election of Mr. Lawrence unanimous.

Masons Entertain.

The banquet given last Friday night by the local Masonic lodge will be long remembered by those who attended, as one where hospitality and good cheer prevailed and which was pervaded by a spirit of brotherly love among the Masons and of happiness and gratitude among the guests. The sumptious banquet was served by Mr. S. B. Thompson in the dining room of the Walton hotel, which had been beautifully and tastefully decorated for the occation. Festoons and ropes of evergreen were swung from the ceiling and about the walls, while the tables were decorated with flowers, evergreens and candles in silver candle sticks. Behind the screen in the west end of the room sat the musicians from Scally's Orchestra dicscursing music so sweet as to inspire the gay conversationalists and yet so low as not to interfere with the excellent speeches or naive answers. After the material side of the banquet had been disposed of (literally) the banqueters were ready for the "feast of reason and flow of soul" which they knew was to be the happy finale of a delightful evening. Mr. W. A. Waters was toast master and first introduced Rev. J. P. Scruggs, of Columbia, who toasted the ladies in an elegant manner. Mr. T. C. Cunningham responded to the toast "The Relationship of Massonry to Society," and handled his subject learnedly, thoroughly and gracefully. The usually reticent T. Scott Mayes talked for a few minutes on "Wags" and pleased his auditors very highly with his apt anecdotes. The Hon. R. W. Miller of Richmond, who responded to the toast "Kentucky" was introduced by Mr. Waters as the next speaker of the Kentucky House. Mr. Miller is a young orator of great ability and eloquently did he sing the praises of old Kentucky. Rev. W. H. Williams was the last speaker his toast being "Are You a Mason?" As usual he handled his subject well.

DEATH OF MRS. JANES

At Ninety-One Years of Age--Died Last Thursday.

Mrs. Mary Jane Janes, perhaps the oldest person in Washington county, died last Thursday, Dec. 28, of acute indigestion, aged ninety-one years, her birthday being Wednesday, Dec. 27—the day before she died. The deceased was a devout member of the Pleasant Grove Presbyterian church, and, in the absence of the pastor, Rev. Williams of the Baptist church delivered the funeral discourse, burial occurring in the cemetery at Pleasant Grove on last Friday.

Mrs. Janes was born in Virginia, but came to Kentucky and settled in this county eighty-nine years ago. Her husband died twenty-six years ago. The deceased had no children of her own but had spent her life in caring for the orphan children of friends and relatives. This characteristic perhaps more acurately than any other depicts the beautiful life of departed one. Her whole heart and soul went out in sympathy to the orphan, and tenderly she cared for them. Truly, she was a good woman.

Mrs. Jane leaves quite a number of relatives in Washington county and elsewhere who regret exceedingly her death. She was an aunt of Mrs. T. P. O'Bryan, of this place.

He writes: "My kidneys were so far gone, I could not sit on a chair without a cushion; and suffered from dreadful backache, headache, and depression. In Electric Bitters, however, I found a cure, and by them was restored to perfect health. I recommend this great tonic medicine to all with weak kidneys, liver or stomach. Guaranteed by C. J. Winter Care Of Fowls

Suggestions For Housing and Feeding the Egg Producer.

In preparing poultry for winter the first necessity is to see that the poultry house is thoroughly cleaned and thoroughly repaired, writes a Michigan poultryman in American Agriculturist. See that there are no drafts of cold air openings that will drive against the birds while on the perch, and at the same time do not go to the extreme of making the house too light.

Whether one has had experience with other systems of ventilation or not, it is well to try an opening in each end of the house near the roof. The one on the east or south end should be open, so that it can be regulated, and use it all winter, even some opening, in the very coldest of weather.

Before being used for winter the house should be thoroughly cleaned and sprayed with any good liquid lice killer or a compound made after the following formula: Eight ounces each of crude carbolic acid, crude crystals napholeum, bisulphide of carbon, a quart of lubricating oil and a gallon of coal oil. This should be used in any poultry house at least once each week from July 1 until cold weather sets in.

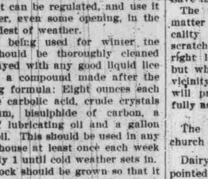
The stock should be grown so that it can be sorted and the butcher stock sold if possible before necessary to place in winter quarters. Only rugged and healthy specimens should be selected for winter and spring use. Immature or weak specimens are better sold for a moderate price in the fall. Attempts to keep them may result in disappointment. The cost of keeping is much more than any increased value by trying to keep them for greater growth or egg production.

An abundant supply of grit and green food or clover hay should be provided. Cut clover, if steamed, is a fair substitute for green food, yet it cannot be depended upon for the same results. The cheapest winter poultry food the writer ever used is a feed of shelled corn fed in litter in the morning and for evening a mash made of steamed cut clover hay, boiled cull potatoes and bran or mill feed enough to mix with it until crumbly. Plenty of grit and fresh water, with fresh ground bone three times a week and the foregoing rations, will produce winter eggs without fail. Coal ashes will be gleaned over closely regardless of grit fed. They are an excellent aid to good health. Save them and feed liberally.

The run provided for winter is a matter that should be governed by locality and convenience. The open scratching sheds are all right in the right latitude and in right weather, but when the temperature goes to the vicinity of zero a good roomy house will provide plenty of exercise and fully as much comfort.

The Rev. W. T. Tibbs, Christian church minister, died at Mt. Sterling.

Dairymen of Shelby county have appointed a committee to engage a veterinarian to examine all cattle in the county.



Time's Up.

And you need that coal bin replenished. Phone the order now and we will be "on time" as to delivery.

Cold weather won't have a terr r for you if your NEW YEAR'S SUPPLY OF COAL is in. Coal famines and strikes may come or go, but they won't bother you. Our coal gets better as time grows older. Buy ours, it's always the best.

MODISH CAPRICS

Bright, Rich Tones, Skirt and Sleeve Styles.

Rich, bright tones of brown, aubergine, red wine tints, royal purple, suave mauves and crushed raspberry are among the season's gay colors, but their very brightness requires the utmost skill in harmonizing them.

The lines of the figure are preserved and enhanced this winter by the long well cut coats and redingotes and by the flaring skirts, clinging around the hips, yet without any strained tight effect.

WHITE DANCING FROCK.

Skirts are not as short as they were last year, even the trotteur lengths being only an inch from the ground, and some of the skirts are quite long behind, as the long skirted coats demand this concession.

Sleeves, after being rather long in making up their minds as to their ultimate shape, have decided to be extremely bouffant as to the upper part of the arm for dressy coats and costumes, plain and simple for tailor mades and very fanciful for evening wear.

The long coat, the short jacket and the bolero are the three heads under which our outer garments may be classed, and each of them is divided into any number of subdivisions.

Trimmings are used profusely, and they are all of the handsome, massive order. Wide silk braids, brandebourgs, silk ruchings, heavy passementeries, silk and woolen laces and rich velvet appliques are all employed wherever there is an opportunity.

The dress illustrated is a party or dancing-school costume. The blouse is made of white esprit tulle, with plaited maline cuffles and cravat, the latter held by loops of pastel-blue velvet ribbon. Skirt, belt and braces consist of pastel blue shot taffeta between openwork and ruches of lace.

Chamberlain's Cough Remedy the Best Made.

"In my opinion Chamberlain's Cough Remedy is the best made for colds," says Mrs. Cora Walker, of Porterville, California. There is no doubt about its being the best. No other will cure a cold so quickly. No other is so sure a preventer of pneumonia. No other is so pleasant and safe to take. There are good reasons why it should be preferred to any other. The fact is that few people are satisfied with any other after having once used this remedy. For sale by C. J. Haydon.

The True Philosophy

Baltimore American.

The past may be doleful and dismal,
The future may be darker still,
But the present is ours to make it
As bright or as dark as we will.
The future lies long stretched before us,
The present quick passes away;
So leave crying and sighs for to-morrow,
And do all your laughing to-day.

The minute of time just now passing,
Is all that in truth is our own;
Then why spend its few precious seconds
In framing the breath for a moan?
If the future has woes, that same future
Has also the tears one must pay;
Then weep—if you must weep—to-morrow
But laugh and be merry to-day.

Oh, rich golden gift of the present!
Let us cherish the joy that it brings;
Save up all our gloom for the future,
And list to the heart when it sings.
So life we'll rob of many trials.
We'll find ill foreseen, passed away,
If we'll only leave sighs for to-morrow
And laugh and be happy to-day.

Look for trouble—one finds it—don't seek it.
And often it stays there afar;
'Tis like mists that seem dark in the gloaming,
Till pierced by the gleam of a star.
Oh, life needs the heart's cheerful sunshine!
Why not have as much as we may?
Then weep—if we must weep—to-morrow,
But laugh while we can laugh, to-day.

The Weather For 1906.

W. W. Marsh, the Winston Place Prophet, who rarely misses in his prognostications, has this to say concerning the coming year "The year 1906 will be a very prosperous year in the commercial line; great prosperity prevailing over the entire country—the year will be free from wars; peace over the entire world. The storms during the year will be disastrous, both on land and water, causing much destruction on the great bodies of water Atlantic Ocean, Great Lakes, Gulf of Mexico, and states adjoining. Great storms over Southern and Gulf States and the Eastern and New England States, the West and Northwest. Cyclones and heavy rains will do much damage, with floods over the states west of the Mississippi river, especially over Kansas, Wisconsin, Nebraska and along western streams in the month of June. There will be a shortage in the wheat and corn crops on account of earley killing frosts during fall months, and droughts during the summer months. The spring will be late and the fall an early one, with killing frosts. The summer hot, with intense heat. The winter will not be a severe winter, but an open one. The winter storm will be severe, and occasional cold waves will prevail in all sections of the country, but of short duration. During the month of January, 1906, severe winter storms will prevail in all sections of the country and snowfall being quite heavy over the states west of Mississippi—the Eastern and New England States and the North Atlantic coast lake regions and the Northern States Northern Ohio and Pennsylvania and Virginia. Traffic will suffer over the East West Southwest and Northwest on account of snow blockades. February 1906 will be an open month. The weather during this month will be mild with occasional cold waves and snow but the precipitation will consist of heavy rains. Floods will occur during February and March, and very high water in June. The month of March will be an old-fashioned March, with many changes. The cotton crop during 1906 will be short on account of heavy rainfall over central western and Eastern Texas, Mississippi and Tennessee.

A Farm For Sale.

I desire to sell my farm, known as the Jno S. McElroy farm, situated one mile from town on the Willisburg pike. It contains 102 acres, and is the best farm, size considered, in the county. Has on it a large, new tobacco barn, three good tenant houses, plenty of water, orchard, and in fact everything that goes to make up a first-class farm.

Painfully Hurt

Lebanon Enterprise: Richard Scearce, the fourteen-year-old son of Mr and Mrs Lee Scearce, met with a painful accident Monday afternoon while celebrating Christmas. He was with several of his young friends exploding fire crackers, when one of the larger variety went off in his hand. The member was badly injured, being torn in several places to such an extent that it was found necessary to take thirty-six stitches in sewing the wounds, and it is feared that he will lose the end of one of his fingers. The young man bore the suffering bravely and is now much improved.

Afflicted with spinal meningitis more than a score of horses dropped in the streets of Williamsburg, and at least half of them died before a veterinary could reach them.

$800,000 Worth of Diamonds.

Elizabethtown News: The richest woman in the world, Hetty Green, keeps about $800,000 worth of diamonds on hand at all times. She never wears any of them, but she knows that they increase in value at the rate of 3 per cent. a year and holds them as an investment. Hetty wears no jewely at all. Her sole posession in this line is marrage ring worth about $18. The increase on her diamond hoard this year will be much larger than in previous years. Diamonds have gone up nearly 10 per cent. In the meantime the lady is seventy-one years old, and growing older every day. She pays $31 a month for a flat in Hoboken and does her own cooking and washing.

Those fellows in the Legislature who personally prefered "Old Joe" for United States Senator, but, in deference to the pressing demand of their constituencies, voted otherwise, are truly to be commisserated. If there is anything that makes a member of a legislature, and especially of a Kentucky legislature, feel genuinely miserable it is to be placed in a position where his conscience is strained.

Now that the holidays are over let us one and all proceed to repair the rents in our moral "raps," and with brave hearts and steady nerves face the duties and responsibilities which come with the New Year.

The Roman candles, the firecracker and little toy pistol got in their work most effectively during the recent holidays, and the old folks are grieved and desperately shocked. But all this will pass off by the Fourth of next July and the small boy will again assert his rights and the old folks will again be given an opportunity to be grieved and shocked.

Congressman Dave Smith has introduced a bill in Congress authorizing an appropriation to dam Salt River. In times past it has been an easy matter for some politicians to "go up Salt River," but if Mr. Smith succeeds in getting the river dammed, how will the boys get over the dam thing when they are compelled to go up?

The old year with its joys and its tears, its battles lost and its battles won, its sunshine and its shadow has gone to take its place in the morgue of the eternal, unalterable past. To cast our eyes backward to the forms and shades now forever gone may blind us to the beckonings which would lure us on in the PRESENT just begun and which calls for the very best our minds and hearts can give. Let the dead past, therefore, bury its dead. The future depends upon what we make the present—and what we sow we shall also reap.

To the readers of The Sun we wish a happy New Year.

A YOUNG POLITICIAN.—Master Dudley Ragsdale, of Springfield, won his race for page in a whoop. Dudley's organization was excellent, and, notwithstanding his youth, he did much toward perfecting it. With the assistance of his uncle, the Hon. W. D. Claybrooke, he wrote letters to many of the members of the legislature and secured their pledges. The Sun extends congratulations.

FRANK LEWIS CAPTURED. — Frank Lewis, who is under indictment for three offenses and who has been a fugitive from justice for some time, was captured last week by the Sheriff of Boyle county and brought here and placed in jail. Lewis is indicted for carrying concealed a deadly weapon, for pointing a deadly weapon at another and for detaining a woman against her will.

In this issue of The Sun appears an exceptionally strong statement of the condition of the First National Bank. The earnings for the past six months are the best ever before shown. After paying to the stockholders the usual four per cent. dividend, and all expenses and taxes, the surplus fund has been increased $4,000 (8 per cent) making same now $25,000. It has set aside $1,287 for taxes for 1906, and leaves a balance to undivided profits of $4,000. The stockholders are to be congratulated on their holdings in this solid old institution.

The Sun has ordered a copy of Farm and Fireside sent to every one of its subscribers, and we presume that all have received a copy. You will only have to glance over it to note that it is an excellent farm paper and home magazine. We are going to give Farm and Fireside to every subscriber who pays up arrearages and one year in advance, and to all new subscribers who pay cash in advance.

On last Monday sixteen new subscribers were received unsolicted, besides a large number of old subscribers renewed. Our subscribers have had much to do with the remarkable success we have attained in building up a subscription list.

ON THE PORCH

By Robert Jermain Cole

Copyright, 1905, by Ruby Douglas

Every day when it did not rain, and sometimes when it did, Thisbe Latch wandered off into the woods or down along the river and came back at night with some added grace from nature's wild treasury. She had run away for rest and health to the little parenthesis in the country that called itself a town. She got a good deal besides these gifts. The two men that were happy enough to live in the same house with Miss Latch were far better aware of her gains than she was herself.

Mrs. Redding kept the house. She had only a few guests. Her son Tom protested against those, so far as the principle went. But when the practice happened to include Thisbe Latch he began to persuade himself that perhaps it was better for his mother to have something that would interest her and keep her from being lonely, as she had been since his father's death. Miss Latch was a schoolteacher, but no one would have detected it—at least by any of the labels that the pictures in the comic papers furnish. Her hair was as yellow as corn silk. Her eyes were direct in their glance, like those of her own school children, and far more disconcerting.

Carlton Cross, another guest at the house, failed to interest Tom very noticeably, although Miss Latch appeared to like him. Cross was spending a few weeks in town settling up an estate for which he was counsel. He devoted his evenings to a pretty obvious effort to settle the estate of matrimony so far as Miss Latch and he were concerned. Every evening after supper the two sat on the broad porch while sunset glorified the valley below them and twilight crept out of the deepest woods where it had been lurking and hiding from the sun all day.

Tom Redding worked in one of the drug stores of the village. That meant that his evenings went into the druggist's profits till such time as he could command a store of his own and hire some other poor soul to work for him. That was the end toward which Tom was slowly advancing, but for the present he was forced to pass out of the door after supper, walk resolutely across the porch to where the more favored man and the girl they both wanted sat and with a grave spontaneous cheerfulness bid them good evening.

On two or three occasions Cross had spared him this pain by taking the girl off for a drive. That was worse yet. It is true, Tom had his Sundays, but a part of these he always spent with his mother. He felt that Cross was forging ahead of him in the race. The thing that discouraged Tom most was this. As he walked downtown he thought of the beauty of the long evening that was just beginning. Having thrilled, himself, under the spell of twilight, he feared its power upon Thisbe Latch.

"If that clever chap," thought Tom, "half knows his business and says the right thing and keeps still at the right time, I'm afraid there's no chance for me." But it was not his way to be melancholy for long. He vowed if the other man did get her he would at least make a little place for himself in her memory.

He thought of her through the day, and every night he passed her on his way downtown he had some word—commonplace it might be—that was charged with the day's repressed affection. In the general chat of the table, in the Sunday visits and in many unconsidered greetings Miss Latch was coming to know Tom far better than he realized.

One night as Tom crossed the porch to go to his work Thisbe asked him lightly:

"What would happen to your old drug store if you should sit here with us awhile? I believe you don't trust anybody but yourself to mix the prescriptions. You couldn't sit still a whole evening, could you?"

"Yes, I could," answered Tom. "I do, anyhow, only you don't see me. I sit right in that chair and listen to everything you say." He pointed to an empty rocker near the one in which Thisbe sat. A look of amused understanding came into her eyes.

"So when the charming Miss Ritchie thinks you are serving her an ice cream soda it's only an illusion—I mean you, not the soda. You are really here all the time?"

Tom nodded. Mr. Carlton Cross looked bored. He was not troubled with very much imagination. Later he had a chance to continue his account of a very grand reception he had attended at Rochester. Miss Latch heard the sound of the young lawyer's voice, but her thoughts were with the drug clerk. The idea that he, down at the store, imagined himself in that particular chair fascinated her. She looked at the empty rocker, and as the twilight deepened and the street lamp was lighted she could fancy that the shadow which the pillar threw on its high back was Tom.

Two days later, instead of leaving by the front door, Tom came around from the side of the house. In one hand he held a little bunch of pansies. He handed them over the rail of the porch, his hat in his other hand, without a word.

"Oh, the beauties! Here's a yellow one with purple eyes and a purple one with yellow eyes," exclaimed Thisbe. When Tom was gone she remembered Ophelia's saying:

"Pansies—that's for thoughts."

She also remembered that the poet Keats was an apothecary's prentice. The conversation of Carlton Cross became less and less interesting. Being no lover of flowers himself, it did not occur to him that the little velvet leaves were his rivals.

When Tom came home that night he found Miss Latch on the porch. She was still holding the pansies in her hands. He walked to the chair beside her.

"I thought you said you were sitting there already," said Miss Latch, with a touch of mischief.

"That doesn't satisfy me any longer," broke out the man impatiently. "That chair can't tell you what I think of you. I can't tell you myself, but I'll try. I think you are the loveliest woman in the world. I can't help loving you."

For a long time she was silent. Then she began:

"If you can't help it, why, then"—

She paused, and Tom leaned toward her. His hand covered hers, crushing the flowers.

"Thisbe," he pleaded softly, "do you care for me?"

The hand he held answered for her. Tom rose from his chair and kissed the girl on the lips.

A little later he said, "You don't know how much afraid I was, sweetheart, to leave you here for those long sunset talks with another man."

"You needn't have been," she answered happily. "The sunset and the twilight seemed to belong to you. The more he talked the more I dreamed of somebody else."

New York's "Smart Man."

George W. Perkins, who was on the stand in the New York Life insurance investigation, used to be called the "smartest man in New York." Mr. Perkins is only forty-three years of age, but for several years he has been a partner of J. Pierpont Morgan and vice president of the New York Life.

From office boy at $300 a year young Perkins rose to be a clerk at $1,200 and cashier at $1,500. In 1887 he was drawing $3,600 a year as solicitor and special agency representative and one year later, 1888, was promoted to agency director at $15,000 a year. In 1892 he was elected third vice president of the company at $20,000 and in 1898 became second vice president at $30,000. For a time he was vice president with a salary of $75,000, but on becoming a member of Mr. Morgan's firm asked to have his salary cut down.

$600 Given Away

The Weeky Courier-Journal (Henry Watterson's paper) wants to share the profits of this prosperous year with its subscribers. It proposes to give away twenty Christmas presents ranging from $100 to $20, amounting to $600 in all. There will be four general presents of $100, $50, $30 and $20, and sixteen presents of $30 and $20 to be given in the States of Kentucky, Indiana, Tennessee, Texas, Mississippi, Missouri, Virginia and Alabama. The plan is fair and simple. Write to the Courier-Journal Company, Louisville, Ky., for a copy of the Weekly Courier-Journal giving full details. It will be sent free.

State Auditor Hager sent out checks to the aggregate of $850,000 Christmas money to school teachers.

Mother Love.

[New Orleans Picayune.]

He was deformed and ill, I know;
From birth, poor lad, he had been so.
I always dressed him; but one day
A gentle friend led me away

A little while, she whispered, "Now
Let us go in, dear, and see how—
How nice he looks." I looked at him
In broidered white—my eyes grew dim.

To weep for him, they said, was wrong
That he would never have been strong
But always ailing, frail and weak.
I listened, patient, crushed and meek

And answered not until the word,
"A burden," I distinctly heard;
At that my throbbing mother breast,
Where once those wan, pale lips had pressed.

Revolted—I cried out, "No, no!
Say, if you will, 'tis better so,
A thousand times and more, but I,
His mother, dare that charge deny

My other children standing near
Are beautiful, beloved and dear;
But him, by sacred, strange enthrall,
I loved the best—the best of all.

WASHINGTON COUNTY BUSINESS DIRECTORY

WHEN YOU WANT TO MAKE A PURCHASE, MAKE IT AT HOME; when you want to have a job of work done, have it done at home. If you go away from home to buy, or if you go away from home to have work done, nine times out of ten you hurt yourself worse than you do the home merchant or the home mechanic. At home the merchant knows you and will not misrepresent his goods to you; he has known you for years, he is your friend, he doesn't want to cheat you, he doesn't want your money for nothing. If you have ever bought anything from a mail-order house doubtless you can remember of having received different treatment. Their propositions look nice in print, but don't "come up." Pay your money "out" at home and it may "come back" again, but send it to one of the big mail order houses and it will buy 25-cent cigars for some millionaire in a European home. The Sun begs to call the attention of its subscribers to the following businesses conducted in Springfield and Washington county by honest and honorable men. When you want to make a purchase look over this list and select your store. You will be tickled when you compare your purchase with that of the man who bought from the big mail-order house. TRY YOUR HOME MERCHANT FIRST; THAT WILL BE TREATING HIM FAIR.

The Adventurers

By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON

COPYRIGHT, 1898, BY HARPER & BROTHERS

"How is the new inheritance?" he asked presently.

There was no shadow of offense in his voice and I should have been surly indeed to have taken for a liberty what was clearly a friendly interest in my affairs. I said I hoped that he would pay me a visit and see for himself.

"Thank you very much," said he, with a delicate bow of acknowledgment. "I shall be delighted. I had a sight of the old place yesterday as I passed the gates."

Hood entered with a tray of refreshments, and Sercombe drew himself up to the table and began upon his untimely meal.

"I don't know what digestion is, Mr. Greatorex," he explained. "I believe it is a term in use among doctors to

"You have frightened my fish, sir," said he.

terrify nervous patients. I eat when I like, not when society wants me." And, filling his mouth, he asked me if I had resolved to live in the castle.

"At present, yes," I answered, "though certainly it would appear to be in despite of fortune, for it is not the fault of some people that I am not sent packing off to London."

He stared at me in the act of drinking, and I felt Hood's eyes also upon me. The next second the innkeeper resumed his work, placing a fork stiffly by the captain's plate.

"How do you mean?" asked Sercombe.

As I had started the tale, I went on with it, rehearsing briefly the visit of Barnett.

Captain Sercombe smiled and went on with his food.

"Oh, I thought some one had been disputing your title," he said, "that is all. I hope you fooled him?"

I related my victory with some satisfaction, and Sercombe chuckled.

"Well, you're going to keep your castle?" he resumed. "Patriotic man! Though I should judge £20,000 to be a good market price for the property."

"It is not worth half as much," said I.

"Then why not, in the name of goodness, take your profit?" demanded the captain, opening his eyes in astonishment.

"I'm in no hurry," said I, smiling.

"Humph!" ejaculated the captain, picking his teeth thoughtfully. "Well, you may be right, though I don't see your reasons. A landed estate is merely a nuisance, so far as my experience goes. It's all payment and no returns. It takes a wealthy man to keep an estate. If I had your place, Mr. Greatorex, I should be disposed to let it, at any rate, and enjoy the proceeds while I might. You'd find no difficulty in doing that, I should think."

"I dare say not," was my reply.

"Why," continued the captain, as if smiling at his own thought, "I would take it off your hands for a month or so for the fishing alone—that is, if you were reasonable."

For some reason or other this semi-jocose offer irritated me, possibly because of previous experiences.

"Between you, you are bound to have me out," I said, rather dryly. "But I assure you I will not budge."

I was not looking at him as I spoke, but out of the tail of my eye it seemed to me that I caught a quick exchange of glances between the captain and the innkeeper, and to my imagination—for such it may have been—the face of the man Hood wore an unmistakable frown. But as I turned sharply he was merely refilling the captain's glass and using a deft napkin upon the soda water bottle.

Sercombe burst out laughing in his comfortable fashion.

"My dear sir," said he, "it is long since I was in a position to pose as a country gentleman, and for my own part I sincerely hope you will occupy the castle as long as I occupy the inn. After that I fear I shall have no further interest in the matter."

I felt distinctly snubbed by the rejoinder, for all that it was delivered in so hearty a manner. But I got out of the inn creditably enough and with a neat stroke in return, all very good humored. All the same, upon my homeward journey I was troubled by that mutual signal which I had seemed to discover between these two incongruous people. As for Sercombe's offer, it was plainly intended for a jest, and I thought no more of it. Yet I was still exercised in my mind, vaguely uneasy and distrustful. And in this mood I settled down to consider my situation that evening and to review the events which I have here narrated. The puzzle was to determine a cause for all the remarkable transactions. Some one wanted to acquire the castle and went about it very persistently. Why? And some one had made raids upon the house to secure something of which I was in possession. What?

Suddenly, and as if revealed by a flash of illumination, the reason was lit up and stood bare and bright before me. It was hidden treasure!

CHAPTER VI.

Now that I had put my tongue to the word I was confident of my discovery. All the facts pointed one way, and I was dumfounded at my previous obtuseness. For what but a hidden store of treasure would explain these incessant attempts upon the house itself or the insistent efforts to take it out of my hands? And what again but treasure could supply so natural a key to old Kesteven's death and his mysterious secret? It seemed to me, too, that upon this hypothesis several facts hitherto inexplicable might be referred to reason. The eccentricity of my host in choosing me for his heir became not so much an eccentricity as a studious piece of policy. He was, in the general verdict, devoid of living relatives, and had so long fallen out of the world as to be practically friendless. He had made up his mind to my honesty, possibly to my capability, and was resolved to trust me. If this were so, as I saw it now, the making of the will had been an inevitable act in the game he intended to play.

I could not imagine that he had foreseen his sudden death, yet with his knowledge that he had an organic disease it was wise to take punctual precautions. It was probable also that the news he had evidently received upon the morning of that fatal day had conduced to his visit to the lawyer. I was to be admitted to his confidence. Twice he had been interrupted in the very nick of his narrative—the second time by the interposition of Death himself. In these considerations my thoughts were naturally drawn to the events of that evening. Why had Kesteven retired to his room? Obviously there was a connection between his errand and the sheet of parchment which I had detached from his fingers.

I opened my dispatch box and spread out the paper on the table once more, poring over it with my pulse throbbing to my finger tips. The meaning was now plain, though the main secret was yet to find. The parchment was clearly the second sheet only of the document which Mr. Kesteven had desired to bring down for my perusal. I sat up at a new and more alarming discovery. Where was the first sheet?

That open window now offered up its secret. That desperate cry was no longer now the scream of mortal agony, but an appeal for help. From the dead fingers I had taken the second sheet of the mysterious document, so pregnant with interest, but from the hands of the living I could not doubt that the first had been violently torn in the course of a struggle in that silent chamber. Terror had surprised the rascal at his work—the terror of that sudden and fearful dissolution, of that humped and pitiful body fallen on the floor. And here now with two ends of the secret, whatever it might be, rent asunder and secluded in separate hands, the hoard of treasure still lay buried in its ancient hiding place as intact and private as it had lain maybe through hundreds of years of silence.

My riddle was read. That certainly was a great step, and in the heat of my discovery, as I sat palpitating with strange emotions of adventure, avarice, even of ferocity, I had no intention to leave the matter where it stood. I was resolved to confront fate and to enter the lists against those undetermined enemies. So far they had kept very silent, working only in the dark, but I swore then and there to meet them, drag them forth into the broad daylight and contest my rights in the hidden treasure, if it existed, against a dozen sorry knaves. I am a patient man and not overquick to take a resolution, but I do not easily lay down a task which I have once undertaken. I swore upon the spot to undertake this.

In the circuit of my fancy I came suddenly upon this consideration, which pulled me up quite sharply, even with a little breathlessness. These unknown antagonists were still banded in arms against me, and I was alone. I had had repeated evidence that I was pursued by their ingenuity and in two ways. On the one hand I was to be evicted from my own house, and simultaneously my bureau was rifled, as I could not now doubt, for the purpose of securing my remnant of the precious document. What would be the next step which these insolent tricksters would essay? I had no one in the castle beyond the estimable Mrs. Main and a neat housemaid, neither of whom was to be counted in a warfare such as the situation promised to my imagination.

The one man that was daily visible about the place slept at Llanellan, as Mr. Kesteven had informed me. What puzzled me at this point was the isolation in which my host had enwrapped himself. He had taken no pains to protect himself. Exposed, as he must have known he was, to the treachery of an unscrupulous foe, he was thrown absolutely upon his own resources unless indeed he relied upon the near proximity of Hood in times of emergency. But Hood perplexed me, recurring in my thoughts, a haunting figure, provoking only a vague uneasiness and a great uncertainty. And once again the odd conjunction of the captain and the innkeeper returned before my eyes. One thing was certain to my newly awakened wits—I must have some companion in my confidence. There were several friends among my old acquaintances who would serve me, but the year was drawing on and the holiday season was at its height. The odds were that I should discover Pengelly or Rogers or Sheppard was far enough from London by this. I wanted aid forthwith, and forthwith must have it. So it fell that my mind recurred to Montgomery. He was not very much to my taste, certainly not congenial company, but he was obviously honest, and I could swear that he would be faithful.

And so indeed he proved. I rode over next morning to the farm which constituted now all that was left of the old estate of the family. He was plaiting a whip in his dining room—a high wainscoted chamber, very dingy and untidy and heaped with all the unimaginable rubbish of a young man's fancy. On my entrance he rose, his silly face beaming red, and grasped my hand with an awkward sentence of welcome.

"It's good of you to come so soon," said he.

"I've come to take you back," said I.

He stared at me. "Oh, all right!" he said, as if this mission of mine had been a matter of course. "Come and have a drink."

It was but 11 in the morning, though the breakfast things still cumbered his table, and so I refused his hospitality, a refusal which did not prevent his pouring himself out a glass of beer.

"Montgomery," said I, "leave that alone and keep your head clear. I want you."

The boy bounded to his feet sheepishly enough to what he doubtless considered my rebuke, but with a show of eagerness which pleased me.

"Got your horse?" I asked.

He nodded, all attention now, and I continued:

"Then fling your legs up and be off, and ask your servant to send on your bags. I'm going to keep you for a week."

"Bully!" he said and clamored out of the room in a cheery fashion.

I had already made up my mind not to be too explicit with Montgomery. He was too recent an acquaintance, despite my conviction of his fidelity, to [illegible] the first occasion of our encounter would not have commended him to many particular people. What I told him, therefore, he was rode back [illegible] the general atmosphere of intrigue in which I was involved. The word that stuck in his mind was "burglary," and it greatly excited him.

"Shall we have the police over?" he asked anxiously.

But, strangely enough, although the thought had occurred to me more than once, it was almost in old Kesteven's words that I replied:

"There are none nearer than Raymond." To that I added, "Besides, I think we two are in no need of assistance against a ruffian or two."

The next two days passed very peaceably. As I am fond of laying my plans ahead, I wrote to Sheppard at his chambers asking him if he were still in town and if he felt disposed to pay me a visit, referring briefly to the strange turn which my fortunes had taken. I saw nothing of the captain, at least at the castle, and for some reason or other I felt no desire to revisit him just now. He had evidently forgotten my invitation, nor did I remind him of it when we met casually upon the road the day after Montgomery's arrival. He gave me a civil greeting, cocking his eye at my companion in his good humored, cynical way, and when we had passed, be looking back, I saw him standing at the crossroads, rod in hand, gazing intently after us. Seeing me do so, he waved his hand and moved off upon his journey. Montgomery was as docile as a spaniel, submitting readily, I suppose, to the superior will, and I had no complaint to make of him save that he wearied me a good deal. He himself, however, had a complaint, for he was grievously disappointed that there had been no bloodshed. We saw not a show of a burglar, and I fancy he thought me in his private mind something of an impostor, which possibly was the very reason which made him strike up an acquaintance with Sercombe. I certainly had no right to protest, for the captain was a pleasant fellow and so far as I knew harmless, and, moreover, life at the castle was not enlivening. But all the same I was a little annoyed to find them upon such close terms with one another.

The third day after Montgomery's arrival I resolved to ride into Raymond to see the little lawyer, and, mounting the black horse which had come to me as part of my inheritance, I left the castle shortly before lunch. The nag was a steady creature, though not very handsome to the eyes, and shortly I was upon the other side of Llanellan and cantering down into the long stretch of forest which lies toward the little town. Here, as it chanced very oddly, whom should I meet but Greenstreet himself, driving out to the castle upon the very point of business on which I was bound for Raymond. Encountering thus we agreed to make a convenience of the locality, since I could not persuade him to turn back with me, and we completed our conversation over a pint of ale at the little hostelry in Llanellan. The transaction was comprised in a brief time, and that finished I turned my horse's head forthright for home.

As I drew near the park gates it wanted a little of 4 by my watch. The sun beamed sharply overhead, and the great ilex by the stone pillars of the gateway threw a black blot of shadow across the drive. I headed the horse across the sward, making for the stables which lay among the farm buildings to the north of the castle. Leaving the animal in charge of the handy man, Williams, I walked back by way of the park, skirting the western wing of the building. Upon this side, as I have said, lay a dense shrubbery, through which the little brook streamed over its pebbly bottom to the waterfall upon the southern declivity of the hill. A pathway ran, circuitously through this growth of laurel and box, evidently of comparatively recent origin, and winding by several pretty spots, bordered with the rivulet, finally emerged upon the boundary of the park and joined a cross track from the gateway by a leafy avenue of limes.

As it was early and I was in no mood to face Montgomery all at once, I struck into the shrubbery and sauntered quietly along the pathway. Suddenly at a bend before me and slipping softly round the elbow I beheld the figure of a man, but it was gone ere my senses were fully awake in that sultry afternoon. I stood still a moment, stirred somewhat strangely, and then ran quickly to the corner. Peering round, I caught sight of a figure stealing among the shrubs. It paused a moment and then, as it seemed to me, slipped stealthily through the bushes and disappeared.

The next instant I had recognized Hood. There was nothing very remarkable in this, but what moved my blood was a more curious recognition. Swift as the flight of a swallow there darted into my mind the recollection of another vision. I identified the memory. It came back upon me with an odd sense of perplexity and a still stranger feeling of fear where and when I had first encountered that lean and stealthy body. I had seen the man disappear in the same furtive fashion upon the banks of the stream in the valley below, and what had then arrested my vague memory now also again attacked it, but this time with certain knowledge. This was the man who had been with Mr. Kesteven upon the day on which I had first encountered him in the wood.

The fact astounded me, thrilled through my warm limbs to the very marrow of my bones. And yet it seemed too absurd to be accepted on the spur of a moment's fancy. I stood pondering in a state of excitement and then, hastily turning about, ran in the direction of the castle.

What was Hood's business there? I asked myself the question without the assurance of an answer. There was really but little to arouse my suspicions, and yet I was agog with curiosity. I entered the castle courtyard and opened the door of the dining room. The first object that met my eyes was Montgomery sprawling upon the table and stertorous with drunken sleep. Plates were laid for two, and empty bottles upon the table testified to a generous lunch. Leaving him for a moment, I ran upstairs and pushed open my door silently. As I did so there was an exclamation and I stepped and came face to face with Captain Sercombe.

Montgomery sprawled upon the table in a drunken sleep.

He held one hand in his tightly buttoned coat and looked at me with a watchful eye.

"This is very regrettable, Mr. Greatorex," he said.

The apology sounded so ludicrous in my ears that I broke into a tiny laugh and thereby relieved myself. The time for action was come.

"I must apologize," said I, "for my unexpected return, the more particularly as I have no doubt interrupted you on important business."

"Not at all," he said pleasantly; "not at all. I had quite finished."

"Then if you have been successful, Captain Sercombe," said I as pleasantly as himself, "I think we had better understand each other at once."

A slight smile ruffled his puffy face, but he kept his hand in its hiding place. "That will be unnecessary, sir, I assure you," he rejoined. "I fear I am a bad hand at crib cracking."

The effrontery of the man amazed me, but I showed nothing in the face that I wore.

"Why not give it up?" I asked smoothly.

He shrugged his shoulders. "Almost you persuade me," he returned jauntily.

"Fishing," I resumed, "is a more equanimous pastime, Captain Sercombe, I have heard."

"No doubt," he responded equably and glancing at the window. A twitching of his mouth belied his calm appearance, and I was disposed to believe that he contemplated a desperate move. I sat down upon a chair by the door and surveyed him coolly.

"May I ask," said I, "if you have found this sort of thing usually profitable?" I nodded at my bureau.

"It was in hopes this would prove so," he answered smoothly. "I am not an old hand at it."

"But you have able assistants?" I asked.

"Come, come, Mr. Greatorex," he replied, with a touch of impatience in his voice, "let us get to business!"

"By all means," said I. "You will find me a most reasonable man. In my profession I have had occasion several times to deal with your profession."

If I had expected him to wince at this undisguised thrust I was doomed to disappointment. A smile flitted over his face, and that was all. He withdrew his hand from the breast of his coat. "May I sit down?" he inquired in his most courteous manner.

"Come," said I, "it is rather I who should apply to you for permission."

"We will not stand upon ceremony," he observed, whipping a chair deftly beneath him.

"A very natural sentiment upon your part," I retorted ironically.

"Mr. Greatorex," said he, with his smile and now thoroughly in charge of himself, "there is one thing I pride myself upon, and that is command of my temper."

"A very useful trait—in your profession," I remarked.

The captain took a cigarette from his case. "You will not mind," said he. "The window will air your bedroom." And he puffed the smoke from his nostrils, and it hung about his ragged red mustache. I waited, my eyes fastened on him.

"What are you going to do?" he asked presently.

His own expression carried not a trace of anxiety.

"In these cases," I made answer, "there is a natural course with which her majesty's dutiful subjects do not usually tamper. For my own part I confess that I was at first tempted to take matters into my own hands, but on reflection I do not think I shall interrupt the ordinary course of justice."

"Ah," he said, taking the cigarette from his mouth, "you will call in the law."

I nodded, and a slow smile illumined his red face.

"I think I can persuade you to forego that satisfaction," he said, "though I may possibly find it more difficult to prevent your earlier resolution."

"I am entirely in your hands," said I, smiling to him, for indeed I was now chuckling to myself not only at the man's equanimity, which was quite to my taste, but at my own mastery of the situation.

He looked at me inquiringly, and I was amazed to see the difference in his eyes now. They were tense, sharp, and every trace of idle indifference had left them.

"You are aware, Mr. Greatorex, what we are quarreling over?"

"I assure you, my dear sir," said I, "that I am quarreling over nothing. I am sitting at your feet. Pray continue."

"I think," he said dryly, "that we are beating about the bush. This game of farce and cards is very well for novices, but we are got beyond that and come to actual quarters. Come, I think this air of yours is a mere affectation which has played its part."

I said nothing save, "I am waiting to hear you, Captain Sercombe."

"You are aware," said he, "what you have in this house." He was watching me very carefully, ready, I did not doubt, to fly off in another direction if I showed my ignorance of his meaning.

"I know what you and your friends are after," said I.

He heaved a sigh of relief.

"Then I table my cards," said he. "You have a piece of paper which I want."

"Exactly," I answered, casting a look at my open bureau. He laughed.

"Oh, I will admit you have the better of me so far," he exclaimed, "But we are not yet at the end of the campaign."

"No," said I; "not until the police from Raymond arrive." He leaned forward and tapped me on the arm very earnestly.

"You mistake me," he said. "I think, Mr. Greatorex, that you do not quite understand the position."

"Upon my soul," said I, "I believe you are right. When a common burglar shall preach to his victim one must indeed revise one's notions of the world."

"You are determined to be flippant, Mr. Greatorex," he replied severely, "and so I will disillusionize you. You have inherited this property from Mr. Kesteven?"

I bowed.

"A gentleman with whom I had not the pleasure of personal acquaintance," he resumed, "but whom I have reasons for considering a very discreet and tenacious man. Now, why, Mr. Greatorex," he said—and he stared at me dispassionately—"now, why do you suppose that Mr. Kesteven did not employ these police of yours?"

We are sorry that the editor of The Sun did not possess a million dollars so he could have played Santa Claus with the correspondents, but hope he may be in shape by next Christmas.

We wish The Sun and it's correspondents a happy and prosperous New Year.

Christmas passed off very quiet here, and every body seemed to have enjoyed this time.

I will close wishing the readers and correspondents of The Sun a happy New Year, and that the editor will prosper with his paper for I don't see how we could do without the paper these cold winter days.

Success to The Sun is the wish of the writer.

Bent Her Double

"I knew no one, for four weeks, when I was sick with typhoid and kidney trouble," writes Mrs. Annie Hunter, of Pittsburg, Pa., "and when I got better, although I had one of the best doctors I could get, I was bent double, and had to rest my hands on my knees when I walked. From this terrible affliction I was rescued by Electric Bitters, which restored my health and strength, and now I can walk as straight as ever. They are simply wonderful." Guaranteed to cure stomach, liver and kidney disorders; at C. J. Haydon's drug store; price 50c.

The Adventurers

By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON

The question certainly took me aback. I had never considered it. If the old gentleman had feared an attack, why had he not taken precautions against it? But I was not inclined to make a poor appearance in the argument, and so "He had excellent reasons," I said cheerfully.

"You say well," said he, nodding, but scrutinizing me keenly. "Excellent, indeed, with which, since you are obviously acquainted, you will no doubt understand a good many things which would otherwise puzzle you."

Here I confess he had me again in his hands. "Quite so," I stammered as bravely as possible.

He laughed softly. "I think, Mr. Greatorex, that we had really better understand each other and not be so [illegible]. What you don't know, despite your grave profession of knowledge, is that the treasure disposed in this house is treasure trove—that is, that it was not the property of the late Mr. Kesteven and was not in his power to bequeath, and consequently is not now your property, but the property of her gracious majesty our sovereign queen, less a somewhat infinitesimal percentage which we may term salvage. That, I take it, is a statement which is new to you."

It was, indeed, and now that the facts were revealed to me suddenly and as by magic the many mysteries of the past few weeks were illumined and grew plain. I kept my countenance as well as I might, for all my astonishment, and said—

"This is very interesting," said I, "and I am in your debt for the news."

"Tut, Mr. Greatorex!" he interrupted. "Haven't I said that we must dispense with civilities? Time passes. I have much before me, and we have not concluded our bargain."

"Bargain?" I echoed.

"Why, certainly," said the captain, grinning pleasantly. "I take it that we are enemies, but that we make war upon terms."

"State your terms," said I coolly, having now no liking as to the new situation.

"That is better," said he approvingly. "In the first place, this contest is a private one, carried on by both sides without public assistance."

"That is very well indeed," said I, "for a party numbers [illegible] against one man."

"If I have gathered any impression of your character, Mr. Greatorex," ob-

"I give you three minutes to be free of the castle."

served the captain dryly, "during a few days' acquaintance, you will be prompt to destroy that inequality. I put no embargo upon your numbers."

"That is good of you," said I sarcastically.

"Secondly," continued he, unmoved and counting on his fingers, "there is no reason why this campaign should breed ill will. I like you, and off duty there is room for exchange of friendly courtesies."

"You forget," I said angrily, "in what relation I am to you. There can be no peace between your profession and mine."

He smiled.

"The incident was an unpleasant necessity," said he airily. "But come, Mr. Greatorex, this attitude of high morals would be very well in you were you the proper heir. But what are we but both upon the same level? Robbers, bandits, what you will, certainly with no great reason for pride, and at least I face the position and would ask you to do the same."

The words of the man completely abashed me. And when I considered, he spoke no more than the truth. He said truly when he described us as upon the same level. We were conspiring each in his way against the laws of this country and flaxing our liberties, in an illegal attempt to steal what the custom of the kingdom had claimed as the spoils of the crown. I will admit that the captain's reasoning confounded me, and I was left staring hopelessly at the situation in a kind of humiliation against which I kicked in vain. Yet I was not for his seeing so much as a wink or a blink in me.

"You must not misunderstand me," said I after a pause in which I digested these reflections. "I put my value on my own situation, and I am willing to agree to these terms, so far at least as they consort with my own inclinations. You will not look for a greater consideration than I would bestow upon you apart from this struggle in which we are involved?"

The Key that Unlocks the Door to Long Living

The men of eighty-five and ninety years of age are not the rotund well fed, but thin, spare men who live on slender diet. Be as careful as he will, however, a man past middle age will occasionly eat too much or of some article of food not suited to his constitution, and will need a dose of Chamberlain's Stomach and Liver Tablets to cleanse invigorate his stomach and regulate his liver and bowels. When this is done there is no reason why the average man should not live to old age. For sale by C. J. Haydon.
